An ambassador of the latter named Martini, whose reminiscences were published in 1860, was a friend of the prince, and a close associate of Confarini, and both would on occasions send him letters from Italy, to sustain their reputation. A BLOODY FIGHT IN FORTY-FIRST ST.

with his wife Ann, on Saturday afternoon, while both were intoxicated. The woman finally struck her husband on the head with some blunt instrument, inflicting a bad cut. Charles McGIVEN, a neighbor, hearing the disturbance, entered, and found the wife about to renew the assault. He endeavored to prevent her, when she caught up a coffee cup and threatened to strike him. As he went out he saw Mrs. Leary throw the cup at her husband striking him on the side of the head, shattering the cup, and inflicting another wound, from which the blood flowed copiously. The two were heard quarreling during the evening, and a crowd gradually collected in front of the place. At 11 p. m. they fought again, and William QUINN, James PARRELL, and others went in to try and caught up a large knife from the counter and made a pass at James Farrell, inflicting a slight cut on one of the man's neighbors. The neighbors were then followed by Farrell and Leary. The latter armed with a hatchet and shovel. They were received with shouts by a mob of 200 men, who were armed with sticks, his knife and Leary's weapons, bricks and stones were hurled at them and at Leary's store.

At least 100 men were then mobbed down, kicked, and beaten in a shocking manner about the head and body. Farrell saved himself by retreating into the store, where he hid for a few minutes. The mob then scattered. Leary, who was found insensible, was removed to Bellevue Hospital, where his skull was found fractured and his face badly lacerated. He lay on the head and face. It was difficult to ascertain anything relative to the fray, as all who participated were gone long before the police could arrive. After much inquiry, James Moore of No. 54, West 41st street, was arrested and taken to the station. He was the only man who had seen his uncle. Later in the

THE INTERNATIONAL WORKINGMEN'S UNION—COMMUNIST SYMPATHY.

A meeting of the Central Committee of the "Internationals" was held yesterday p. m., in an obscure portion of the city. Twelve delegates were present, three of them powerful and prominent among being the American, Irish, French and German, although it is a noteworthy fact that the German speaking delegates were in the minority. Prominent in the meeting was one of the recent Irish exiles, several of the German delegates remarks were translated for the benefit of the others. Considerable discussion was had upon the propriety of making a vote. Even the French delegates, after a moment's hesitation, declared that it would have a beneficial effect upon the cause. The delegates assented, as it would excite Roman Catholics and other prejudiced against the Union on account of the recent disturbances in France. The vote was taken in Paris, and was in favor of the resolution. The French delegates pressed the matter, and it was necessary to enlignise the acts of the Commune, however much they might feel inclined to do so, and to state that the French delegates affirmed that he did not think it so serious a crime to kill a man as to kill a nation. He was, however, the German voting solidly in the negative.

day evening. It was urged that the names of the principals in Communist who were in charge be painted on placards and that they be placed around the hall, but this was objected to on the ground that it was difficult to ascertain who had been really killed, and that the placards would be removed. A statement was offered whereby the injunction, "Versailles, shed no more blood!" was to be painted, and that the placards should be removed. The speaker reported that his section had recently admitted two women to membership. After some desultory discussion the meeting adjourned.

Napoleon Schoenberger, proprietor of the lager-beer saloon, No. 574 Hudson st., jostled with his hands on his hips, and with a look of defiance in the neck by the latter, and seriously wounded. Schoenberger was locked up in the Greenwich-st. Police Station. The wounded man was taken to the hospital.
